High School Students Learn Practical Money Skills with San Diego Chargers in Financial Football

Vital Money Management Skills Lead to Smart Financial Future

San Diego – Betty T. Yee, First District Member of the California State Board of Equalization (BOE), will cheer on students from Southwest High School as they square off in a Financial Football showdown. The event will take place at Southwest High School at 10 a.m. on October 28, 2014.

The students will team up with San Diego Chargers center Nick Hardwick, and City Councilmember David Alvarez to play a competitive football-themed video game designed to show how financial literacy and responsible money management can lead to a winning future on the gridiron of life.

“Financial literacy, like many other things, is simply a learned skill that can be developed if we have the desire and determination to do so,” said Ms. Yee. “Since having money depends more on how well we manage it rather than on how well we earn it, financial literacy is best learned early in life. Practical hands-on tools, such as Financial Football, help our youth understand how to make money work for them as they embark on the road to financial success.”

Financial Football is a free, NFL-themed educational video game and classroom curriculum developed by Visa. The educational game has been distributed to more than 28,000 middle and high schools in 37 states, including California. Financial Football combines the structure and rules of the NFL with financial questions of varying difficulty. To score points, players must answer various money management questions correctly. Wrong answers and penalties cost a team yardage. The team with the highest point total after four quarters wins the game.
